Key Findings

Social media wins reach, traditional media wins trust

Social media has become the default gateway to news in Jordan. Almost all consumers use social platforms for news, and nearly two thirds name them as their main source. Yet this dominance does not translate into trust. Television remains the most trusted news source, while Facebook ranks among the least trusted. Older audiences are more likely to complement social media with traditional and online sources. For brands and media owners, social platforms deliver reach, but presence in trusted outlets such as television is what lends a message credibility.

Misinformation concerns are encouraging fact-checking

Fake news remains a major concern within Jordan's media landscape, with most consumers believing misinformation exists to at least a fair extent, and nearly four in ten saying they were misled by false news during the past year. At the same time, consumers appear to be taking a more proactive approach to verifying information. Almost three-quarters report always checking the credibility of news before believing or sharing it. Visible verification practices are becoming a competitive advantage, and brands should expect their claims to be examined rather than taken at face value.

Credibility is built through validation and transparency

When assessing whether a news source can be trusted, Jordanians place the greatest importance on comprehensive coverage of local and international news and cross-referencing information with other outlets. Trust is also closely linked to a news outlet's reputation, accuracy, and timely reporting of current events. Investing in broad, well-sourced coverage and openly show how stories are verified are best placed to win audience trust, brands and organizations communicating through the news should priorities those outlets.

Actionable recommendations for organizations in Jordan

Build trust, not just reach

Social media may dominate news consumption, but credibility remains concentrated among established news sources. As consumers become more selective about where they obtain information, trust can become a key differentiator in a crowded media environment. Brands can anchor important messages on trusted television or established news outlets and use social media to amplify them rather than lead.

Use social media as the entry point

With nearly two-thirds of Jordanians relying on social media as their main source of news, platforms should be treated as discovery channels rather than the final destination. Media owners can publish short explainer clips on social that link back to full reporting on their own site or broadcast, turning reach into deeper engagement and more informed news consumption.

Make credibility visible

Trust is shaped by more than just delivering news. Audiences increasingly value comprehensive coverage, information that can be verified across multiple sources, and strong editorial credibility. Outlets can add source lists to major stories, maintain a public corrections policy, or partner with a fact-checking organization to demonstrate transparency.
