1. As you may know, every 5 years in Canada a census is performed to gain statistical information about Canada and its people. In the past, the census would include a mandatory long-form version that went to 20% of households in Canada in addition to the mandatory, shorter version that went to everybody. Citing citizen concerns over the personal nature of the questions in the longer form, as part of next year's census the Government of Canada has replaced the mandatory long-form census with a voluntary version that will go to one-third of all Canadian households. However, some groups have argued that the loss of information from the long-form as a result of some individuals choosing not to complete it will have negative implications for policy-making because we'd know less about ourselves. Would you say that replacing the long-form, mandatory census that went to 20% of all households with a voluntary version that would go to 33% of all households is a good decision or a bad decision?
